Highlights Information in Public Documents

The Dominican Republic's score on the Open Budget Index shows that the government provides the public with scant information on the central government's budget and financial activities during the course of the budget year. This makes it very difficult for citizens to hold government accountable for its management of the public's money.

The Open Budget Index 2008 evaluates the quantity and type of information that governments make available to their publics in the seven key budget documents that should be issued during the budget year. One of the most important documents is the executive's budget proposal. It should contain the executive's plans for the upcoming year along with the cost of the proposed activities. The proposal should be available to the public and to the legislature prior to being finalized, at least three months before the start of the budget year to allow for sufficient review and public debate.

In the Dominican Republic, the proposal is not released to the public prior to approval, meaning citizens do not have a comprehensive picture of the government's plans for taxing and spending for the upcoming year.

Moreover, it is difficult to track spending, revenue collection and borrowing during the year. The Dominican Republic publishes its in-year reports, though they cover less than two-thirds of total expenditures and lack some important details. The mid-year review is not made available to the public. Publishing this document could strengthen public accountability by providing a more comprehensive update on how the budget is being implemented during the year.

It is also difficult to assess budget performance in the Dominican Republic once the budget year is over. Although a year-end report is produced, allowing comparisons between what was budgeted and what was actually spent and collected, it does not provide much explanation of these differences. Also, while the Dominican Republic makes its audit report public, it can be difficult to access information on whether the audit report's recommendations were successfully implemented.

Access to the highly detailed budget information needed to understand the government's progress in undertaking a specific project or activity remains limited—despite the fact that the Dominican Republic has codified the right to access government information into law.

Public Participation and Institutions of Accountability

Beyond improving access to key budget documents, there are other ways in which the Dominican Republic's budget process could be made more open.

Opportunities for citizen participation in budget debates could be increased. For example, the legislature does not hold hearings on the budget in which the public can participate.

The Dominican Republic's Supreme Audit Institution enjoys a fair amount of discretion to decide which audits to undertake, though it faces some staffing constraints.

The Open Budget Index evaluates the quantity and type of information available to the public in a country's budget documents. A country's placement within a performance category was determined by averaging the response to 91 questions on the Open Budget Questionnaire related to information contained in the eight key budget documents that all countries should make available to the public.

Research to complete the Open Budget Questionnaire was undertaken by:
