

In response to the observations of the monitor, UDN organized a public dialogue with district officials, who later agreed to allocate resources for the construction of two new classroom blocks, teachers' houses, and latrines.

Public health services have also improved under the watch of the CBMES. Monitors in Bugiri District found that hospitals and clinics were severely understaffed and lacked the resources to provide meaningful services to residents. CBMs began monitoring the Buyingja Health Center in 2005 and found that it needed significant investment. After a sustained lobbying and advocacy effort, Bugiri officials increased the supply of drug kits and allocated funding to hire another midwife. A new double-cabin ambulance was donated to the center by the central government, following reports from the community monitors that expectant mothers were dying on their way to delivery. More mattresses were acquired, increasing the number of beds available, and hospital staff began to report for duty on time. A clinical officer recently reported that "there have been a lot of improvements since the monitoring began."

In the Kamuli District, the CBMs focused on accelerating the pace of several infrastructure projects designed to improve living conditions and spur economic development. The Bulunda-Butansi-Kakindu Road project caught the attention of CBMs in the district. While more than US$20,000 had been earmarked to upgrade and maintain the road, it was in nearly impassable condition. With the help of UDN, the Kamuli monitors mounted a campaign to pressure district officials to improve the road network and even aired their concerns on the Empanga FM radio station. The local government finally fixed the road, making access to schools, hospitals, and markets much more reliable. In the Bugaya subcounty of Kamuli, a borehole had been dug for public use as a well. Locals were unaware of this resource and left it unattended. District CBMs realized there had been a lack of communication between Bugaya officials and the community and subsequently informed residents of their rights and responsibilities regarding the well. Many districts now have improved water, sanitation, and transportation infrastructure thanks to the efforts of local monitors.

The CBMES not only evaluates finished projects but also scrutinizes the entire procurement process. Monitors have often pushed contractors to honor their agreements and have had untrustworthy ones blacklisted from the public bidding process. CBMs occasionally receive complaints from residents about corruption in the Ugandan government. In Kumi District, for example, monitors witnessed students seated on the floor of their classroom even after thousands of dollars were set aside to purchase desks. Their report was directly responsible for the Chief Administrative Officer's prosecution for fraud. According to UDN, CBMs are "not witch hunting but system building." The efforts of the CBMs to root out waste, fraud, and abuse at the district level have helped strengthen the capacity of the Uganda Debt Network to affect change in government on a national level.

UDN's Participation in the Partnership Initiative

The Uganda Debt Network already has a strong relationship with the International Budget Partnership from their participation in the IBP's biennial Open Budget Survey. By becoming a Partnership Initiative member, UDN hopes to expand on their successes with the CBMES by increasing the capacity and autonomy of district-level CBM groups. This will allow the UDN to shift its focus to facilitating monitoring, aggregating local concerns, and using locally collected evidence for national level policy advocacy.
